QUESTION NO: 2

Your company has three regional offices. Each office has its own network administrator. Each administrator has a user object in the tree that is assigned the Supervisor right to his or her Organizational Unit object; allowing to perform all administrative tasks in their container. Today, you accidentally deleted the Salt Lake City administrator's user object, which was named LMorgan. To fix the problem, you've decided to simply re-create the object, using the same name, in the same context where it was before. Will this strategy work?

A. No, the administrator will lose her rights assignments because the new user object has a different value assigned to its GUID property.
B. No, you will not be allowed to recreate the object, using the same name, in the same context where it used to reside because eDirectory preserves GUIDs assigned to objects based on context.
C. No, you will not be allowed to recreate the user object using the same name because eDirectory requires all object names to be globally unique.
D. Yes, you will be allowed to recreate the object using the same name . The administrator will have all the rights assignments she had before because you used the same user object name.
